

Job Skill Superbook #7 Book 3. Car-Trucker-Motorbike-Small Engine Job Guide

Jobs in the automotive industry range the spectrum from design to production to sales to mechanics. Many of the auto plants are unionized and theres waiting list to get in. To sell cars, some people walk in off the street and get a job with a dealership simply because theyre good sales people but your best bet is to get training first such that you know something about cars and understand the price schemes. Car books are at #629 at the library. Many vocational schools offer autobody repair although you really learn the job by doing it over time because its partially an artform. There is a certification process, the highest level being ASE (Automotive Service Excellence) Master Collision Repair and Refinish Technician. Painting is a part of autobody repair although it could be a separate trade. Car painters generally learn on the job and some people in autobody shops specialize in painting only. Automotive body repairers straighten bent bodies, remove dents and replace crumpled parts that are beyond repair. Usually, they can fix all types of vehicles but most body repairers work on cars and small trucks. A few work on large trucks, buses or tractor-trailers. Automotive body repairers use special machines to restore damaged frames and body sections to their original shape and location. They chain or clamp the frames and sections to alignment machines that usually use hydraulic pressure to align the damaged metal. In many shops, automotive painters do the painting. In smaller shops, workers often do both body repairing and painting. A few body repairers specialize in fiberglass car bodies. Some body repairers specialize in installing glass in automobiles and other vehicles. Glass installers remove broken, cracked or pitted windshields and window glass. Curved windshields are purchased precut from the manufacturer but flat windows sometimes must be cut from a sheet of safety glass. Glass installers apply a moisture proofing compound along the edges of the glass, place it in the vehicle and install rubber strips around the sides of the windshield or window to make it secure and weather proof. Many automotive body repairers enter the occupation by transfer from related helper positions. Persons in good physical condition who know how to use handtools learn the trade as helpers, picking up skills on the job from experienced body repairers.

Helpers begin by assisting body repairers in tasks such as removing damaged parts and installing repaired parts. They learn to remove small dents and to make other minor repairs. They then progress to more difficult tasks such as body straightening. Generally, skill in all aspects of body repair requires three to four years of on-the-job training. Automotive body repair training programs are offered by many high schools, vocational schools, private trade schools and community colleges. Certification by the National Institute for Automotive Service Excellence, which is voluntary, is recognized as a standard of achievement for automotive body repairers. To be certified, a body repairer must pass a written examination and must have at least two years of experience in the trade. Completion of a high school, vocational school, trade school or community college program in automotive body repair may be substituted for one year of work experience. Automotive body repairers must retake the examination at least every five years to retain certification. The majority of body repairers employed by automotive dealers and repair shops are paid on an incentive basis. Under this method, body repairers are paid a predetermined amount for various tasks and earnings depend on the amount of work assigned to the repairer and how fast it is completed. Employers frequently guarantee commissioned workers a minimum weekly salary. Helpers and trainees usually receive an hourly rate until they are skilled enough to work on commission.
